THE PROTECTOR

NORTHROP COMES UP EMPTY

Disgraced. Embarrassed. Shunned. These are all words that have been used by colleagues to describe archeologist Dr. Burton Northrop after his recent expedition to southern Sudan. Funded entirely by The British Museum to the tune of £8 million, Northrop's expedition was to discover, in his own words, "the final resting place of King Solomon and the wealth of treasures therein entombed." However, after a lengthy 18-month excavation of the site, Northrop returned to England empty handed. No tomb was discovered, nor any said treasures.

"It's honestly quite the debacle," says a source at the museum who wished to remain anonymous. "We were skeptical, but frankly Northrop was so certain and insistent that I guess he was able to bend the right ears to secure the financing. After this though, I can't imagine anyone giving him funding for another dig ever again."
